8. Beautiful Losers: Don Shebib's Between Friends

A taut, downbeat drama about a clumsy heist set in Northern Ontario that goes horribly wrong, Don Shebib's third feature, Between Friends, is considered by some to be a better film than his debut classic, Goin' down the Road.

By Barry Keith Grant

12. Before the Beginning: William Davidson's and Norman Klenman's Now That April's Here

A quartet of short stories by Morley Callaghan was the source material for Now That April's Here, only one of a handful of English-Canadian features to be shot in Toronto during the late 1950s.

17. English-Canadian Films of the 1950s

Although there was an mini-explosion of feature-filmmaking in Quebec after the Second World War, in the rest of Canadian it was almost non-existent.

18. The Catherine Films: Rethinking Our National Cinema from an Amateur Perspective

The Catherine Films is a collection of long-lost home movies from the 1930s through to the 1950s. In Canada—a country with a limited cinematic heritage—amateur filmmaking is an important record of our collective past.

20. A Composer's Experience with Phillip Borsos

Michael Conway Baker wrote the music for three Phillip Borsos films, including the Genie-winning score for The Grey Fox. He recalls his working relationship with one of Canada's best—and most temperamental—directors.

29. Gilles Carle and La Vraie Nature de Bernadette: Saintly Sinner, Sinful Saint

Widely regarded as Gilles Carle's masterpiece, La Vraie Nature de Bernadette provokes its viewer with irreverence, ambiguities and tonal shifts between farce and melancholy.

32. On Ethics and Aesthetics: The Things I Cannot Change and Courage to Change

Tanya Ballantyne Tree's NFB film The Things I Cannot Change is a notorious textbook case for ethical dilemmas in cinéma-vérité. It is also a striking, important documentary full of poetic images and heart-wrenching moments.

By Matthew Hays

34. Madeleine Is... Worth a Second Look

Madeleine Is... was the first feature made in Canada directed by a woman. The experience left director Sylvia Spring disenchanted, and she soon quit the business. Her film remains an underappreciated gem of early feminist filmmaking.

By André Loiselle

38. Montreal Main: Uncertain Identities

Conceived by Frank Vitale, but collectively directed, scripted and enacted, Montreal Main was a "shooting star" within English-Canadian production in Quebec in the early 1970s—a little film made on a small budget that has come, over time, to represent the best in classic Canadian cinema.

By Peter Harcourt

41. Downtime: A Minimalist Comedy of Despair

The first feature from the Winnipeg Film Group, Greg Hanec's Downtime was made on a shoe-string budget with high expectations. It was an official Canadian entry in the Berlin Film Festival in 1986, but this remarkable and complex film received virtually no distribution and remains a hidden treasure in the vaults of the Film Group.

44. Time and Space: Goin' down the Rails with Stations

Stations, Newfoundland's William D. MacGillivray's debut feature, is a quiet, meditative "rail movie" that penetrates the odd combination of displacement and roots that constitutes a kind of Canadian identity.

By Tom McSorley

46. Petting to Climax: Direct Cinema, Direct Sex, 1956-1970

The NFB's Merry-Go-Round and Ladies and Gentleman...Mr. Leonard Cohen—two films that represent our national cinema's first encounter with the sexual revolution in the 1960s—are re-examined in detail.
